

- White, blue or grey gums
- Stretching out to breathe more easily
- Cats will open their mouths to breathe if they are really struggling
- Check for choking - do they have anything stuck in their mouth or throat that you can remove?
- Stopped breathing? If your pet has stopped breathing, give CPR.

Step three: Call your vet

- Whether you need to call your vet, or go straight to your vet practice will depend on how severe your pet's breathing problem is.
- Take your pet to your vets immediately if they:
 - are unable to breathe
 - have collapsed
 - have white, grey or blue gums
 - are getting rapidly worse
- If possible, phone on the way to check they are ready for your pet to arrive.
- If your pet has less serious signs that improve once they calm down, they may not need emergency treatment, but it's still best to get them checked, especially if their breathing is quicker or noisier than usual.

Pre-existing conditions

If your pet has a condition that affects their breathing, such as heart disease, asthma or BOAS, it's important to contact your vet if their breathing changes.

Published: May 2020